Research Statement

My research program focuses on understanding and quantifying the nature and controls on variability in surface processes, biota, sedimentology, and geomorphic forms in modern tropical marine and coastal systems. To achieve these goals, my group's research emphasizes field study of ramps, rimmed shelves, and atolls, observing both processes (waves, tides, chemistry, etc.) and product (biota, sediment and seascapes), using in-situ measurements, remote sensing, and GIS analysis of spatial patterns, and enhances learning using computer simulation modeling. I have worked in, and analyzed data from, the Pacific region, including Kiribati, the Cook Islands, French Polynesia, Tokelau, Tuvalu, Fiji, , and others, including work with governmental officials and NGOs. Projects all fall within the scope of topics under the Ocean Decade.

Results are reported in nearly 60 peer-reviewed papers and over 200 abstracts, as well as numerous presentations and unpublished reports.
